Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from A Study of the Literature of West Virginia, 1822-1922 To the loyal citizen of West Virginia the literature which has been produced within the boundaries of his state has an inspiring interest. He naturally feels that those writers who have lived among his native hills and mountains must very often have expressed in their prose and verse the same thoughts that have occurred to him in this environment, and that their mode of expression must be very like his own. And in this feeling he is quite justified. There is indeed a distinctive flavor in all the hill-dwellers writings which is as unmistakable as it is difficult to define. Perhaps it can never be defined completely, but at least the present brief study undertakes to show in some measure how the literature produced by residents of the state differs from that by residents of the surrounding commonwealths, with a few suggestions as to the possible causes of its distinguishing characteristics. The monograph here presented is the outcome of several years study of local literature. In...
